

The State of Indiana has adopted a telephone privacy law which has been very effective for me and my family of five, and I would oppose any federal proposal which would limit or jeopardize its effectiveness. We used to receive several telemarketing calls (up to 8) per week (particulary during dinnertime), and since subscribing to Indiana's no-call list, we receive virtually none. We have confidence in the present Indiana law and our Attorney General. Please consider how not to diminish this effective state law. Thank you, respectfully.
